Luxury Nurse

CAROL MORRIS

CHAPTER EIGHT

WHEN Leitha accompanied Dr. Gates to Mason Tannahill's bedside, she was shocked at the old man's appearance. All the stiffness had disappeared from his face, leaving it a sickly yellowish hue. His breathing was labored and slow. Even his large frame seemed shrunken in the massive bed.

"It's nothing to be alarmed about," Dr. Gates said in his crisp professional tone. He had greeted Leitha with a brief nod that merely acknowledged her presence as a nurse. "Mr. Tannahill is subject to these attacks," he added, lowering his tone. "Heart. And he refuses to obey instructions. Perhaps now, with a nurse instead of just that servant of his, he'll get along better."

In spite of what the doctor said, Leitha was amazed. Old Mr. Tannahill had been in such high spirits the evening before. He had claimed his health was excellent and that only the minor injury suffered when he had fallen from his horse caused him to take things easy.

"I will do my best," Leitha told the doctor, resolving that she would indeed see that her patient obeyed orders. Old Mr. Tannahill would find that he would not be able to get around her as he probably could his old servant.

THE old man stirred now, opening his eyes. His voice was a harsh grumble. "I don't like this place," he complained. "I heard anyway. It's your fool medicine. Gates, that's a name I don't like. Worse than all my farmhand indulgences. Ah, good morning, my dear! I'm not feeling any better. Kindie in the dark eyes at sight of Leitha. "I shall be quite all right. Always manage to fool old Gates. Anybody would be all right, even Gates, with such a lovely young face as Miss Mallory's to look upon."

"Of course you'll be all right," the doctor returned promptly. "But remember, you wouldn't give up—and yourself—these scares, if you'd follow orders." He leaned over the bed, holding his stethoscope against the old man's chest, then removing it as he straightened. His face wore a satisfied smile. "Thanks to the medicine you disapproved of, you're settled down again. I think a hypo, however."

"I don't need anything more," Mason Tannahill grumbled. "Just told you I'm all right now. Got up too quickly that's all. Slept too fast. As soon as I have breakfast—"

"You'll get no breakfast," Dr. Gates informed him sternly. "Until you rest a short while. That's right, Miss Mallory," to Leitha, who had found the things she needed. "Be-leave us. We'll have to make our patient realize he is not as young as he used to be."

"Fiddsticks!" Mason Tannahill growled. The color had returned to his face, the pinching gleam to his eyes. He half raised himself on one elbow, shaking a fist playfully in the doctor's face. "If I had that fall I'd show you how strong I am. Just as I'll show you I'll ride again before I die. And I'm not ready yet, by a long sight, to die. Robert Gates! I intend to live a long while."

"Of course you do," the doctor said soothingly. He pushed the elderly man back against his pillow as if to show who was in charge now. "But if you don't lie quietly and allow Miss Mallory to inject this needle, she may refuse to remain with such an unruly patient."

"We shall get along," Leitha said, smiling down into the old man's face. "I'm staying, at least until you can ride with me, Mr. Tannahill. I ride. Under this morning. She's such a darling and I can't tell you how I enjoyed the ride."

Personal Paragraphs

Mr. and Mrs. Brewster Weather and family and Mrs. Dora Weather, all of Americus, Texas, have arrived in the home of the former sister and the latter, Miss Weather, who is a special attendant.

S. D. Blaylock, employee of T. V. A. has been transferred from Fortuna, Del. N. C. to Ft. Lauderdale, Fla.

Mr. and Mrs. Gene Brewer announce the birth of a six pound 13 ounce daughter born at Murray Hospital on July 29. She has been named Linda Lee.

Miss Minnie Jo McCord spent the past week in Bardwell as guest of her aunt, Mrs. Mandy Parker.

ride and the country. It was incredibly beautiful, the loveliest country I've ever seen. "You felt that?" Mason Tannahill returned. His look held hers, searching her face as on their first meeting. Again he seemed satisfied with what he saw. He settled back into his pillows now, giving a contented little sigh. "Go ahead," he ordered. "I'll be good. I'll do whatever you want, so as to keep that engagement with you, my dear. I'll fool you, Gates! He closed his eyes, turning his head a little as Leitha prepared to insert the needle in his arm.

DR. GATES gave Leitha her final instructions outside the bedroom door. "He's as stubborn as a Georgia mule, but as fine an old gentleman as ever lived."

"I'm sure he is," Leitha replied warmly. "We'll get along," she repeated as she had to Mason Tannahill.

The doctor glanced at her sharply, beginning to appraise her capabilities. There never was any warmth in a look from Dr. Gates. It was one reason the nurses called him a "cold fish."

But Leitha, having been on duty when his daughter had been hospitalized, had seen him in an unprofessional role and had decided that he did have a "human" side.

She said, "You don't want me to give a second hypo unless necessary, do you, Doctor?" She did not mean to question Dr. Gates' instructions, but she did not want to make any mistakes in the care of the old man.

The doctor's reply was sharp. "You will carry out all my instructions. If they aren't necessary I wouldn't give them." Then, perhaps realizing that he had spoken sharply, he added, "You handled my daughter's case very well. Belmont, also. For that reason I felt that you would do for this case, even though you have not had a great deal of experience and are rather young."

"By the way—the doctor gave me another of his sharp looks. "It seems that Mr. Tannahill already had you in mind. It seemed a bit odd to me, you happen to know of any reason?"

Andres had said he thought it "odd" that his uncle should have specified that he wanted her. She answered the doctor as she had Andres.

"I see nothing odd about it at all, Dr. Gates. I suppose Mrs. Belmont, or someone in her family, mentioned that I had proved satisfactory."

"No doubt," the doctor said. Yet there was a deep line between his brows.

He was a neat, distinguished-looking man, typical of the successful physician. He was not only head of the staff at the hospital where Leitha had completed her training, but he was widely known outside. As Miss Daley had said, it was an honor to have Dr. Gates agree to have you on any of his cases. Apparently on this one, he had agreed to Leitha rather than suggested her.

DR. GATES left and Leitha made certain that her patient was resting again. As she went back down the long hall, she encountered Charlotte Upfield, who apparently had been waiting behind her own door, ready to open it as Leitha passed. She was in a neighborly, a friendly affair that fitted her plump figure quite snugly.

She said almost in a whisper, "Won't you step inside a moment, Miss Mallory?"

Leitha thanked her, but said she did not believe she would take time to come into Mrs. Upfield's room just now. "Some other time," she said, not wishing to appear unfriendly. She liked this childish little woman.

"Oh, just for a minute or two!" Charlotte Upfield's big eyes were beseeching. She held the door to her room wide, even reaching out a plump, bejeweled hand to urge Leitha to accept her invitation.

Annual Acree Reunion Is Held At Lake

The annual Acree reunion, which is always held the first Sunday in August, was held Sunday, August 3, in the little park at the west end of Fitzhugh bridge on the Tennessee river. The attendance was about normal.

At an early hour Acres and their relatives began to arrive; some from many points, notably, Mississippi, Memphis, Paris, Nashville, Clarksville, Cumberland City, Dover and Model Tennessee, and Hazel and Benton, Kentucky.

At the noon hour two long tables were loaded with the most elaborately prepared foods—the writer has seen for a long time—such as is characteristic of Tennesseeans east of the river. Boiled ham, barbecue, fried chicken, cakes, salads, pickles, pies and other good things to eat was in super-abundance.

After burning up old friendships and much friendly conversation, and partaking of the abundant supply of food and lemonade, it was agreed to take a vote as to where the 1948 reunion was to convene; one place being the writer's grove at Miller's cross roads, the other place being the park at Dover; the latter place was selected on account of it being nearer for the greater number who expect to attend.

All in all, it was the most enjoyable day the writer has spent with his old friends and relatives for a long time.
